February 6, 2007

There is a recall out now for my 1999 Yukon regarding the ABS sensors needing cleaned and/or replaced. This recall covers some 804,000 vehicles in our 'salt belt' states with my state of Pennsylvania being one of them. Unfortunately, my vehicle VIN number is not under that recall and I strongly feel it should be.

My Yukon is exhibiting the very same symptoms that my husband's 2000 Silverado did. Premature ABS engagement as well as slow speed non-braking. I located the recall for our Silverado on the Internet and got the recall taken care of and the braking problems no longer exist. My Yukon is listed under that same recall that my husband's Silverado was but the VIN isn't; but it needs to be.

When coming to a stop, for instance at a stop light or sign. Even when I brake very early (so I can be at a very slow roll in case I can't stop) my brakes still make the tell-tale ABS whirr sound and then my vehicle almost stalls, the headlights go dim and I have to continually pump the brakes to get them to hold. Again, my husband's Silverado exhibited these same things. All of these instances were experienced at speeds of 10 MPH and slower.

I go to nursing school at night and when pulling into the parking lot and attempt to park, I turn my wheel and apply the brakes, the vehicle just skids, going straight as if I'm not turning the wheel at all. I now have to pull straight into an empty parking spot and back into whatever spot I choose so I can (1) pull straight out without braking while in reverse as I'm afraid of skidding into a car behind me and (2) so if I'm braking while in reverse parking into a spot I won't hit nothing but the cement parking barrier. This has changed the whole way I drive.

Not driving this vehicle isn't an option. While I'm at school at night I drive it because I'll be alone (I have three small children whom aren't allowed to ride with me in this vehicle for the sake of safety.) I have to drive this vehicle at night so that my husband will have the safe Silverado at home in case he needs to take the children somewhere.

I very strongly feel this vehicle needs to be included in this recall because this is a defect in the ABS braking due to salt build up from the harsh, but necessary winter maintenance the highway uses. Thank you for your time and I hope to hear from the Administration very soon.

Sincerely,
