Dear Mr. Friedman,

Please change the requirement for inspections of new vehicles to two years instead of just the next year.

I bought a new Camry in April this year(I usually drive @12 to 13,000 miles a year). Why should people who purchase a new vehicle be required to have it inspected in a year? Are our brakes going to get worn out, our tires turn to slicks, our lights not going to work, our horn malfunction? Did this inspection catch the very serious ignition err of GM in the last 10 years?

I find this requirement just a excuse for states to collect money at the expense of American's time and wallets.

The 21st century is the time for some common sense and streamlining, especially at a time when most Americans need more financial help and not have their time wasted on frivolous 'safety' issues. Thank you for considering this issue.
