Child has been using each of these seats for approximately 10 months. She just noticed within the last month that the child takes his fingers and reaches back and picks at the foam. She has never seen foam actually in his mouth, however, she presumes that since "he's 18 months and that's what all babies at that age do", he has put it in mouth. She has also not noticed that he's passed anything in his stool to confirm that he's actually swallowed anything either. The pieces that he has picked are approximately the size of a pencil eraser. She no longer has the foam pieces.

Karen Fogt Unknown 8/23/2021 7 52 30AM
[redacted] sent me an email over the weekend stating that her child is picking the foam on the new seats. She said that the styrofoam is not wrapped and is exposed. She said that she doesn't know what to do at this point with the seats. I replied and asked that she provide me with the DOM's of each seat, as well as, a photograph showing the concerned area on the styrofoam.

C. Groff: This report was assessed under 16 CFR 1117.3 and determined not to be reportable. While the small bits of foam described by the consumer may have been considered a small part, the child did not need any medical attention and did not experience any breathing issues as a result of the incident.
